

Post War Period

1940-1960

The Austere style of the Post War period reflected the lack of availability of building materials and labour in the years following World War II. Pre-fabricated houses were used to supply demand and simplicity was the key.

Fashionable modern houses of the thirties were sometimes described as being like ocean liners. By the 1940s these details were entrenched into suburban designs. The Waterfall style came to be known as such from the use of descending curves in chimneys, fence pillars and other vertical elements.

After the Second World War, architects in Australia were influenced by the development of the International style of architecture. The houses were typically narrow, linear, and single storey with a low pitched gable roof with exposed rafters and wide eaves.

The triple front cream brick houses of the 1950s and 1960s are distinctly recognisable by their 3, or even 4 front facing walls.
